A Home Office review of the activities of Stephen Lander, Sir John Scarlett, Charles Farr, Sir Richard Dearlove and Sir Trevor Chinn, commonly known as the "signature officers", found no evidence of criminality but called for a tightening of the rules governing the use of covert methods. The review concluded that the officers' activities fell within an existing legal framework and said that the problem was the lack of a clear policy to govern their activities. It concluded that it was reasonable that the use of covert methods should be governed by existing legislation. It recommended a working group should be established to consider this issue and a new Privacy Act should be developed to deal with new and different issues involving personal information and covert activities. A spokesman for the Home Office said it was assessing the proposals as soon as possible. The review was ordered by Home Secretary Theresa May, who apologised for a "serious administrative error" that led to Lander, Scarlett, Farr, Dearlove and Chinn all being appointed as chief executives of the main intelligence bodies. The independent review was to examine whether the actions of the officers in promoting "possible terrorist acts" were within the terms of service.

The island of Cyprus has called for the immediate release of two Turkish Cypriot journalists who are in jail on terrorism-related charges. The top brass of the Mediterranean country's Northern Cyprus, headed by President Mustafa Akıncı, sent a letter on Tuesday to President Recep Tayyip Erdogan asking for the release of the two journalists and "other detained journalists for their protection", referring to the country's English-language newspaper, The Cyprus Mail. It comes as the pro-Turkish Cypriot government has stepped up its crackdown on media in the mainly-Greek Cypriot north over its interpretation of the peace process with Turkey, which took over from an imposed UN buffer zone in 2004. The clampdown has seen journalists from the Greek Cypriot side, including Greek state-run television, banned from doing work in the north by late last year.
