Immunofluorescent detection of telomerase was performed in formalin fixed paraffin embedded human prostatic adenocarcinoma specimens by using a mouse monoclonal antibody (mab H-8) to telomerase. Telomerase positive cells were observed in 5/17 tumors examined by using anti-hTERT. The staining patterns of telomerase positive cells were different: (1) Many cells which were positive in indirect immunofluorescent detection of anti-hTERT are negative in immunohistochemical detection of anti-hTERT in the same specimen. In this case, we think that telomerase protein expression can be suppressed during paraffin fixation. (2) Telomerase positive cells are seen in whole tissue section. (3) Many cells with the different patterns in indirect and immunohistochemical methods exist. In this case, we think that telomerase protein expression can be influenced by localization of cells and antigen-antibody binding conditions. (4) Some telomerase positive cells are not in direct contact with basement membrane in some regions of tumor. In this case, we think that tumor cells are heterogeneous with respect to telomerase protein expression.

Cognitive control over attention bias in children and adults: a comparison of the Stroop and Simon task. The ability to inhibit attention towards a distraction is a major source of individual differences in cognitive control. To date, these individual differences have been mainly studied with elderly adults. In the present study, we examined whether children and adults differ in their ability to control attention. To this end, a Stroop task and a Simon task were used in which attentional control was measured by Stroop interference and Simon congruency effects. We hypothesized a performance advantage of adults over children in both tasks. Our findings do not support this hypothesis. Rather, we found that children performed more accurately and rapidly than adults in the Simon task. Our findings indicate that attentional control in children is comparable to that in adults. We discuss our findings in relation to various current theories of control.
