10% c. 15% e. 25% total) Above three values may be adjusted in the recipe to obtain desirable attributes like'smooth texture'. After that, I plan to write different recipes for each of marble' and 'polished marble' depending on the color and hardness of the stone and the consumers' needs. A: Baking soda isn't really an acid. It is an alkali, and is a very mild one at that, being mildly irritating to the skin and gastrointestinal tract. It might also be mildly poisonous when swallowed in high doses. In baking, it is best to use it as a leavening agent (as in pancakes) where it acts like a weak acid. In a chemical sense, it is also called a weak acid because of this. It is actually a base, and more acidic than baking powder because of this, but baking soda is much more often used in baking, and has a more neutral taste. However, if you are reacting it with a strong acid like vinegar, it can neutralize it. It will also neutralize many weak acids if you are working with a large enough amount, and will make the pH high enough. (15g in 1L of vinegar would do the trick.) It is also a stabilizer, and will stabilize solutions against changes in acidity. I do not recommend using it as a buffer. Do not use it for corrosion. It will not help. You can use it to raise the pH of water with food coloring. This does not happen in real life because the soda reacts with the ingredients in the foods. You can use it to make thin, clear glazes. For example, you could make thin honey glaze by combining 4 tsp of the soda with 1 cup of honey. The soda will keep the sugar from crystallizing. It will not make it more acidic, but it will make it very slightly thick.
