Clarkson, 37, died in hospital on Sunday (24.01.13) after being declared brain dead following her brain aneurysm surgery on Friday (22.01.13) at the Queen Elizabeth Hospital, in Margate, Kent. Her management team at the hospital said that Clarkson's family "would like to thank everyone who has sent her well wishes and have been very kind and patient with all their enquiries." Clarkson's daughter, Esther Bayrakdarian, 22, said that her mother had already begun preparations for the "funeral of a lifetime" on Saturday, adding, "The doors will be open 24 hours a day, and they have told us that mum will be in the best room of the house." have to deal with the risk of second opinions, your diagnosis, and a parent who has to deal with long term recovery after a brain injury. As a result we believe it's time to raise the bar on brain injury resources for parents. Together we want to see: good brain injury information for parents and caregivers, and for professionals who care for them. a better system of referral and connection between medical care and neurodevelopmental services. better technology and support for neurodevelopmental screenings and assessments. access to a referral center to improve continuity and consistency of care for children and adults with brain injuries. across all regions of Canada, the best-integrated system of community-based services for children with brain injuries The recommended new brain injury network would do a few things to help the situation. It would make sure that the information parents need is readily available, and that parents are referred to the services they need quickly. The idea is that there would be a place for family physicians and other
