Tool Free on PC and Android. As soon as the rain stopped, we were off on our 1 1/2-hour climb to a peak in the region of 500 m above sea level. I am a very keen walker, but I am not a very strong one – at least not at the moment. I have no illusions that I am going to win any races, but I can always fall behind and then try to pull back on the descents. And that's what I did on this occasion. After a quick scan of the immediate area I was told about one of the peaks to the right-hand side of the steep slope in front of us. I was happy to get a viewpoint as this meant I would have a view of the other sides of the peak. In addition to that, the road was quite narrow and I could see no one coming the other way – I was happy to be in the majority. After a while I realised that there was a constant stream of people heading in the same direction. And once again there were just too many people for me to see the other sides of the peak. I was slightly annoyed that a large group was occupying the entire trail and keeping everyone else away from the other view. However, I was quite philosophical and was not going to let this affect my enjoyment of the hike. I also thought that if I was lucky and found a quiet spot, I would have a good view of the surroundings. It took me around 15 minutes to reach the peak. I found an ideal view in a small clearing at the top. I went out of my way to get there and climbed as slowly as I could without stopping. I wanted to enjoy every minute of the view

Montreal Canadiens prospect report, we're covering new NHL commitments heading to the Bulldogs, and have plenty of T10 chatter to start things off. And why not? It's the first day of training camp! Like last year, the Bulldogs had no NHL draft picks, and only one undrafted free agent – defenseman Petter Granberg – made the active roster. This year, Granberg, along with this year's draft pick, forward Oliver Wahlstrom, will be joining the Bulldogs in September. Over the weekend, Bulldogs captain, Nikolaj Ehlers, and right-winger Juuso Valimaki were named to the 2018-19 roster for the first time. Ehlers, who's spent most of his NHL career as a fringe top-six winger, was given some heavy minutes with the Dallas Stars last year. He should be fine as an everyday NHLer, at least for the time being. Valimaki has spent the past two seasons in the AHL, and was with the Texas Stars last year. But as both Ehlers and Valimaki will be battling for roster spots this season, one could see Valimaki spending time in the NHL. Ehlers will have to be a top-six forward in order to stick on the team, but his star is on the rise. And at just 19 years of age, Valimaki is only getting started. The other NHL commit, and the Bulldogs' highest draft pick, is defenseman Ville Heinola. The 18-year-old defender spent his OHL season with the Guelph Storm, and could end up as an AHL-regular, playing third pair. The remaining three Canucks prospects are all in North America. Jacob Markstrom is in the NHL, while Jett Woo is in the OHL with the London Knights. Jacob Almeida is playing in the ECHL for the Reading Royals, in their post-season run. The Islanders have two prospects, Vili Saarijarvi and Jan AbReference, but are currently in the AHL. Returning Bulldog Segers is down to the Bulldogs after failing to win the job last year. On the back of some strong training camp performances, Bulldog Louie Belpedio also returned to the Bulldogs. His emergence as an effective penalty killer is something Vancouver needs if
