Erythropoietin (Epo) production in yeast has been reported in the literature, but the levels of Epo reported in the literature are well below what is required for therapeutic use in the blood. We report here on the creation of a stably integrated plasmid which can be expressed in a high-yield manner in Saccharomyces cerevisiae. Epo has been expressed in Saccharomyces cerevisiae, yielding an average of 53 microg/L of recombinant protein. The recombinant protein has been purified and shown to be highly functional, as demonstrated in the inhibition of the proliferation of CFU-GM in vitro. This indicates that this is a promising strategy for the production of recombinant human erythropoietin at a level that is clinically acceptable.# testt.pl # # Test the "system" module # # Author: James Todaro # Date: Mar 31, 2013 # Version: 1.02 # # Note that these tests will need to be updated for Perl v5.12 and Perl v5.14. # # Usage: perl testt.pl [file] # # # To run these tests: # perl testt.pl # # perl testt.pl ARGS # # perl testt.pl --file FOO [--no-file] # use strict; use warnings; use Test::More; use Test::Fatal; my $verbose = 1; subtest 'is_system_name()' => sub { my $args = shift; my $expected = 'perl'; my $actual = system($args, '-c', 'echo $ARGV'); is($expected, $actual, $args); }; subtest 'is_system_command()' => sub { my $args = shift; my $expected = 'perl'; my $actual = system($
