This study will use non-invasive measurements of cardiac output and thoracic fluid content during a short high-intensity exercise and a short moderate intensity exercise to determine whether or not there is a decrease in lung volume or cardiac output. If such a decrease occurs, it will be determined whether it occurs prior to or during the exercise and which, if any, cause. This pilot study will use ultrasonography to measure changes in thoracic fluid volume and cardiac output during intense exercise. Condition or disease Neoplasms Detailed Description: Patients with thoracic neoplasms, in particular lymphoma, have a high morbidity and mortality. Overall survival has improved in the past decade, however, patients still have a median survival of only 1 year after the initial diagnosis. Knowledge of factors related to exercise capacity would be useful in the treatment of these patients,
