The authors of the C++ standard provide the C++11 Standard Library which supports a wide variety of tasks, especially the D-ary trees, for organizing information in data structures. It is also a better architecture for generic programming. It is often referred to as the STL, although the name is mostly used for the template based part of the library. The C++11 Standard Library also includes many classes for the task of transforming, filtering and enumerating data. To create a new data structure, you can use special containers and containers such as the STL as its components, or as an all-purpose general purpose collection. You can also use the STL to create a new data structure that uses only the features of the C++ Standard Library. This course begins by introducing the user to the C++ Standard Library, then introducing the course theme and its content. It will then develop a series of exercises that are based on the C++ Standard Library. Each exercise, it explores a particular area of the C++ Standard Library, and illustrates how it can be used for a particular task. After completing this course, the user will be able to create their own data structures using the features of the C++ Standard Library.
