I must not see something obvious. Any ideas? I tried adding a call to the function right after I created the variable, but it didn't do anything either. A: You are missing curly braces as shown below: var k = $("#redtoggle").click(function(){ $("#redtoggle").toggle(); }); Once you've made that change you should get the expected result. You can also check out this JS Fiddle for a working example. With the increasing popularity of portable electronics, there is a growing need for auxiliary power devices for electronic devices that provide power to various components of the electronic devices. For example, automobiles, motorcycles, portable electronic devices, and other devices include power sources, such as an internal combustion engine and an alternator, for providing power to various electrical systems. The performance of the power source determines the performance of the entire device. A power source can have a relatively lower capacity if it is situated in a relatively large device, where power may be generated from one or more electrical systems of the large device and distributed to one or more electrical 3da54e8ca3
