Lawmakers in Idaho passed a bill earlier this month that, if signed into law, will become the first state in the nation to allow women to undergo an abortion if the procedure is requested by themselves. The bill was passed by the state’s Senate last week on a party-line vote, 23 to 11, and on Saturday the Senate Judiciary Committee unanimously approved it. The bill still needs approval by the full House of Representatives, and then it will be sent to the governor’s desk. Supporters say the measure will help many women who want to end an unplanned pregnancy and want to control the timing of the procedure. Other supporters say the bill is necessary because the right to abortion is being challenged in several states, and Idaho is in danger of being the first state with no abortion law. The Center for Reproductive Rights, an international women’s rights organization, says the new law will have devastating impacts. Advocates for women’s reproductive rights who are in Idaho are fearful that the law could also lead to more problems. Reproductive rights activists are concerned that anti-abortion activists could take the law as a way to challenge the right to abortion. “I’m concerned because I am not certain what the long-term legal and constitutional ramifications of this bill could be,” Dr. Colleen McNichols, Idaho’s only OB-GYN, said in a statement. She called the law “unnecessary, and potentially dangerous.” Groups say the new law will give women in Idaho the option of undergoing an abortion in her home, instead of in a doctor’s office, which could lead to more complications. The Women’s Health Right of Choice law, which is being pushed by conservative lawmakers, is set to take effect Aug. 1. One in three women will have an abortion by age
