The economy is recovering, albeit slowly, from the recession. Yet unemployment remains at a four decade high of 9.4 percent, and the average worker makes a mere $22,800 per year. How do we fix that? With the recent wave of austerity measures in the United Kingdom, several politicians are calling for nationalizing industries, including the energy sector. Their aim? Save the country and make the economy safer and more stable — and, of course, less expensive. But what happens when the government owns an industry, such as when we nationalize our oil reserves? Most of us believe it will be worth more than it is presently, since it will hold a supply of crude that no one can buy. However, there are far more factors at play here than simply the price of the oil. We Shouldn't Nationalize the Oil Industry British economist John Maynard Keynes, an economic visionary of the 20th century, said: "Practical men who believe themselves to be quite exempt from any intellectual influence, are usually
