If they are similar, can they be used for the same project or it is better to use one than the other? A: Dart is a language (similar to JavaScript), which is compiled to the web-assembly format (an intermediate format, similar to .Net/Java). WASM (WebAssembly) is the final format in which a code is compiled. Having said that, Dart is a "multi-language" language (similar to Python). In the simplest form, the language looks like the following. `class Person { int age; }` Just like python, it can be defined inside another class (this is called the "inner class"). The language has other things like modules, classes, methods etc. One can read more about the language here: The compiled web-assembly code is similar to .Net/Java web-service web code. There is a bunch of resources available here: Having said that, there is a difference between a programming language and its implementations. People create dart-based servers and dart-based client-side code (which you would install on the browser). Wasm is a low-level programming language. In other words, it is a programming language that can directly be compiled into the web-assembly format. It is more similar to C/C++. However, it has a "higher-level" programming language which is a subset of wasm. There is a language called asm.js, which is a subset of wasm. I guess that is the reason why dart also has its own "subset" of wasm. You can read more about WebAssembly here: Have a look at this post for more information: Finally, to answer your question: Yes, you can use
