The wonderful blogging world that I frequent occasionally gets me back into the spirit of 1968. As someone who was raised when we had an expensive telephone system where we could play anything anywhere, I still remember being taken to the phone booth by my parents. My father would start making a call, then hang up. Ten minutes later, I would be there. Why did we do that? Because we used an actual phone book. We didn't have an address list. We had to find the contact we were looking for

by going in the book, page by page, and pulling a listing out to see if it was the company we were looking for. The computer age was but a promise at the time and there was a shortage of telephone company employees in the United States. While the computer explosion of the latter part of the 20th century may bring us back to what was supposed to be a phone book that was sorted by alphabetical listing, the telephone companies continue to create various ways to make it harder and harder to find what you are looking for in the phone book. I've been asking why that is for years and have never received an answer. The need for contact information is so important because it is a primary way to keep people in a community – family and friends. As the newspaper has gone to the web, it seems that the number of phone calls to people’s homes has gone down significantly. There is a value in having a physical address. We often forget the value of that when we are pulling together a bunch of information from websites and we don’t have a connection to someone. Because we have the phone, we can usually maintain an email address or a web site so that we can at least have a way to get in touch with the family or friends. But, if my family lost their last phone book, the computer age is going to present a problem to them. If they look in the white pages online, they will see that the family that they have been looking for is living in Peru. Or, they will have to look for the person using the phone books, page by page. We have this idea of contact information as a record of us and, to that extent, I am completely in line with the phone book approach. But, it sure does make me appreciate what I have instead of being thankful for what I have. Search Can't Find What You
