nfsIzraelFlagClock Crack Mac Screenshot:The exciting era of genetic manipulation of cell and gene therapy has brought to attention the need to develop safe vectors that can be used for high-volume clinical therapy, and also for research. A number of studies have documented that the key to successful gene delivery is the ability to package the vector DNA efficiently in eukaryotic cells. This project is focused on improving the transfection efficiency of plasmid DNA (pDNA) in human cells using the novel amino poly-lysine-sheep erythrocyte ghost (PLL-SEG) DNA delivery system. The goals of this project are to (1) optimize the PLL-SEG method for delivering plasmid DNA to human cells, (2) develop effective protocols for manufacturing PLL-SEG particles, (3) investigate the potential for PLL-SEG particles as vectors for gene therapy of infectious diseases and cancer, and (4) optimize the PLL-SEG method for delivering protein to cells. For the first aim, experiments have been designed to optimize the PLL-SEG method for transfection efficiency. These will include, studies to determine the effect of PLL-SEG particle size and molecular weight on transfection efficiency, and studies to determine the optimal number of cells to be transfected by using the PLL-SEG vector system. Also, studies are planned to examine the effect of the transfection agents on PLL-SEG transfection efficiency. In addition, studies are also planned to examine the transfection efficiency of the PLL-SEG vector system for delivering two plasmid DNA (pDNA) encoding different reporter genes, as well as pDNA encoding a gene to be overexpressed. For the second aim, studies have been designed to develop an efficient protocol for manufacturing PLL-SEG particles, including detailed studies to optimize both the pH and temperature of the polymerization reaction, and to investigate the effect of PLL-SEG particle size on the transfection efficiency. For the third aim
