Males of the lycaenid butterfly species belonging to the genus Glossochromis exhibit an unusual humpback morphology on the hindwing and colourful spots on the ventral hindwing. The aim of this study was to determine whether this male phenotype is a result of a chromosomal duplication or a single chromosomal rearrangement resulting in the duplication of a chromosomal region that contains one or more effector genes associated with the pheromone detection system. We found that the target region is located on the sex chromosomes, where the male phenotypes occur. Chrom
