It will become available broadly later in October for about 200 million AOL subscribers. In order to participate, one must register and download the software. After that, users can access the service from a desktop icon on the Windows desktop, or through an emulator under Windows Vista's control panel. Among the things AIM 8 offers is file transfers for sending large media files, games, and animated GIFs, and a screen sharing tool that lets two users share one display. The software currently offers a number of improvements to the AIM service from the old AOL version, said Chris Tinney, principal product manager at AIM. The software supports resizing photos, one-touch auto-synchronization and the ability to see who's online, even when offline. The software also adds many more phone numbers that users can access via SMS, as well as integration with Google Maps and Google Calendar. "It has many of the things that people use AIM for," Tinney said. The software is available for download from the AOL website, under the "AOL Instant Messenger 8" banner. AIM 8 will be available for Windows, Mac, and Linux PCs. The desktop version of AOL Instant Messenger will be available broadly in October, Tinney said.
