Blending is a basic tool that Photoshop provides to allow you to combine two or more layers into one. To blend two layers in Photoshop, first create them by pressing the New Layer button in the Layers panel (Figure 3-2"). Then select one of the layers, and drag the cursor over the other to make it transparent (Figure 3-6). If both layers are visible in the image window, the layer on top appears brighter. If the two layers are on top of one another, the top layer appears darker, and the layer below it is lighter, because the top layer is hiding the bottom layer's pixels.

What's New in the Adobe Photoshop 7.0 Free Download For Pc Full Version Setup?

How to Give a Great Portrait to a Child Most of us think of portraiture as photography taken of a person. It's true, though the term has also come to mean digital photography taken of a person. What's more, this term can actually be applied to any photographic work done to portray the likeness of a person in a manner that is artistic and that, hopefully, creates a high level of interest among others who see it. With all that in mind, it's easy to see why the ability to create beautiful portraits can be so elusive for many photographers, even when they have the talent and the knowledge to do so. The fact is, no matter what background one has, the ability to create portraits of a person is not taught in school. It's taught by doing, and more often than not, being put in the situation where the need to create such a portrait is a bit dire. That's where I come in. So, this is what I do, not for publication, but rather for this public blog. I try to help out the photographers I know who are having difficulty doing what I do so well, and do it without all the talk (as much as I can avoid it). Thus, what I provide here are my suggestions of what I think would be helpful to photography as a whole, and thus, a wonderful gift for all photographers. What it all boils down to is three steps. Step 1: Understand the need and psychology of the subject. The most common lack I see in portraits, especially those of children, is the lack of understanding of the psyche of the person posing. It's not that there is anything terribly wrong with this, as some may imply. It's simply that the common approach, in most cases, is the approach of the photographer. The photographer wants the subject to stand against a backdrop, pose in the manner that the photographer wants and wants the subject to look good. But, that's the problem. And it's not that the subject has a problem. It's that the subject has no idea about what is going to make the photograph really special or why the photographed person would want to have a portrait of himself or herself done. And, that's what will make the photograph really special, because it's the personality of the person that ends up being the special part
