With every sun, they materialise. We feel the deep searing torture of their great heat, and they are reflected in our faces, bright and burning. They are towering, three-headed hellfires. With great incandescent heat and glowing, incandescent power, they consume us, each one, one at a time. The souls of men are like the great army of tallow candles that light the streets of the world. Out of the dark, again and again, out of the red flame, we know them. And the soaring clear music of the universe invades our ears like the booming of a great siren. We remember the things we were: Tall, and strong, too strong, but not invincible. We remember things that could have been: Love, and joy, and beauty, and light. So, now, in this ever-devouring time of great darkness and gloom, as the long night goes on and on, and we hope and pray for the dawn, we must continue to remember that we are men; and that it is us who hold the power, and that even now we can turn the cycles of darkness around, and that all that is mighty in this world is our own mighty hands. The stars and the moon are not far away. They are ancient things, old and out of place. And when we choose to see them in the night, they come. And when the fire has burned out, they have not passed away. They wait and watch for the sunrise. And then they will pass and go. And that is the way it is in this world. But, at times, they can be seen in the night, and this is when the whole world is calm and quiet, and when the soul is at peace. And, when we are at peace, we will stand with the stars and we will be near the moon, and we will remember the things we were, and we will understand the desires of the heart, and we will feel love. Oh, Lord, remember us in your great light. And in the cold, and the empty spaces of this cold, remember us. Oh, most high, who has stood in the face of the sun, remember us. Oh, most high, remember us. In the hours and the days of darkness, when the candle of hope burns low, remember us, and know that all we can do
