Tyrosine hydroxylase phosphorylation and inhibition of enzyme activity by ceramide. Although ceramide is known to inhibit the enzyme activity of the catecholamine biosynthetic enzyme tyrosine hydroxylase (TH), the mechanism of this inhibition has not been elucidated. The present study shows that ceramide, in addition to inhibiting TH activity, also causes a rapid phosphorylation of the enzyme. This is a result of a direct ceramide-dependent decrease in the rate of enzyme dephosphorylation catalyzed by a phosphatase(s). As TH is a cysteine-containing enzyme, it is also a substrate for covalent conjugation to reactive components of the TH phosphatase system and possibly other enzymes. Western blotting with a monoclonal antibody against TH demonstrated that all of the enzyme protein in intact PC12 cells was found to be phosphorylated on a single cysteine residue, while partial phosphorylation of the same cysteine residue was also noted in membranes prepared from PC12 cells by repeated freezing and thawing. Covalent modification of the enzyme could serve to delay its subsequent processing by proteolysis, thus causing an accumulation of enzyme protein. The rate of dephosphorylation of the phosphorylated TH enzyme was found to be retarded in comparison to the unmodified enzyme, confirming that ceramide-dependent phosphorylation is responsible for the inhibition of TH. These observations imply that the reduction of the activity of TH in cells by ceramide is a direct consequence of its enzymatic inhibition.(1, size, offset, BOOST_MULTI_INDEX_CHECK_INVARIANT).commit(); } }; // Comparator between transformations struct transformation eq { typedef transformation type key type; typedef std::pair value type
