I haven't found the ideal successor to Probst yet, I know quite a few here, but none of them have ever been the best, or any good. The only thing is, I don't really want to ban someone for longer. I've seen a few threads, but I'm pretty much afraid that I won't find the right match for me.The context effects on mental rotation processes in the "thin" and "thick" version tasks. An old debate about mental rotation processes concerns the association between the context in which a rotation occurs (angular context) and the speed and accuracy of this process. The present study aimed at contributing to the clarification of this debate by examining context effects in the two widely used versions of the Mental Rotation Task (MRT). We recruited 180 participants from the general population and subjected them to both an angular and a viewpoint variant of the MRT in two different contexts (allocentric and egocentric). In both versions, a rotated line was always presented as an independent object on the plane of a page. If the line was presented in egocentric conditions, it was always associated with a face. The results showed that in both versions the context did not influence the response time, but the angular and the viewpoint contexts influenced the task performance, with advantages for the angular context. Finally, the results demonstrated the importance of controlling for visual similarity between the first and second presentation of the stimulus, which is important in order to rule out the possible effects of visual invariance.INTRODUCTION {#s1} ============= Recently, uncoordinated hand motion (UHM) has received a lot of attention in rehabilitation after stroke, with focus on the associations between timing and type of movement and recovery of hand function[@r1]^)^.
