Before the advent of Photoshop, software designers and developers just used well known tools like Paint Shop Pro and TWAIN for simple tasks like image resizing, image enhancing, and many others. Photoshop came along and combined all of these functions into one program and gave them a new, intuitive, and easy-to-use interface for non-experts to use. Photoshop has become an industry standard for image manipulation, and many websites and web apps (referred to as the web) use it for their work. Even TV shows and popular movies use Photoshop and digital effects to make their images come to life. What Is Photoshop? Photoshop is a type of image processing program that enables raster images to be manipulated, enhanced, modified, or painted on top of each other. It has a layer-based editing system that enables raster image creation and altering with multiple overlays that support transparency. The first version of Photoshop was released in 1987 and had a price tag of $295. It was later revised and renamed as Photoshop 2.0 in 1989. The first public release of Photoshop 3.0 was in 1991, and, to this day, versions are still developed and released. The Photoshop free trial gives you full access to the program and allows you to make a maximum of three custom image files. That's pretty much it, unless you buy it. You can create a layout and place different image files over the original or over one another. If you create a document in Photoshop, it can be printed, scaled, and saved for future use. The number of layers in a file is unlimited, so you can create multiple layers that each contain different effects and editing styles for the overall image. Each layer also has a fill color or solid paint. This is the color of the layer within the document. In Photoshop, layering can be used for photo retouching or touching up an image before printing and to create depth in a photograph. You can have multiple colors on top of each other, and over a transparent layer, which is useful when creating masks and mixing black and white or transparent layers. Q: Redirecting multiple pages to same index I have multiple pages on my web app, let's say: /pages - page_1.php - page_2.php - page_3.php -... I would like to redirect each of these pages to a single index, which is not the homepage. Let's say it's like: /index - single_page.php - 404.php - 500.php How would I go about redirecting each of these pages to the same index, which redirects to the /index? Is there a way to do this with .htaccess or something similar? Also, I should mention that the /index should be an index with an AJAX loader before the redirect. A: Add this to the .htaccess: RewriteEngine on RewriteCond %{REQUEST_FILENAME}!-f RewriteRule ^(?:index/.*$) [R=301,L] The !-f part will stop it from using the 404.php and 500.php files if someone tries to access them directly. You should make sure that all of the pages are redirected to /index without the index.php file using: RewriteCond %{THE_REQUEST} ^[A-Z]{3,}/s/+index\.php/s [NC] RewriteRule ^ /index [L,R=301] The present invention relates to an optical disk reproduction system and, more particularly, to an optical disk reproduction system capable of reproducing an information from an optical disk on which an error correction code is appended to address information. Although significant advances have been achieved in the art of recording and reproducing digital information, one disadvantage in the conventional art of recording and reproducing digital information is that significant deterioration of the recorded signal is produced by scratches, dust and the like. As a result, errors often occur in the recorded digital information. For example, if a user records video information on a video tape (VTR) without sufficiently wiping off dust adhering to the VTR, scratch marks, etc. occur in the recorded video information. If the video information is reproduced from the VTR without wiping off the dust adhering to the
