Due to a new sensitivity setting, the tracking data could have a slight impact on how players look in-game, but otherwise there should be minimal impact. In the end, all the game looks like on a first-person view. "I've been playing in these suits for two-and-a-half years. We've been able to refine it over the years," Croot said. "We do a good job of collecting it and taking that data and applying it to the game. We collect it, map it, and then we apply it to the game at a level where the player isn't aware of it." "We felt like there was a bit of an opportunity to be able to deliver something to our players and teams that would deliver the next level," Croot said. "We've not only been able to model the player's animations, but also take that into gameplay and then look at how that gameplay is played." "The guy in the action camera is doing the plays," said Croot. "The player is doing the training, the player is doing the actual matches. But the play is actually being driven by that data." "You are actually doing that data," he added. "It's just that the player may not be aware of it. So you don't see it in game. But you can actually feel it." How is it possible? "To take data from a real player and then play that data in a virtual environment," said Croot. "We've done this successfully for years. We've done sports where we capture real-life data, and then play it in the game. And the game has the benefit of moving in the real-world and feeling like it's in the real-world." "HyperMotion is a process where we track player movement. We create a model of the player that exists in a real-life environment. When the player in that environment moves, we have models of that movement based on that player," said Croot. "That data is then translated to the match data in-game." The process could be a little complex, but Croot
