Salivary gland infection caused by Actinomyces urogenitalis in an interferon-gamma knockout mouse. Actinomycosis was suspected in a chronic periradicular lesion in the mandible of an interferon-gamma knockout (KO) mouse. This mouse has been established as an animal model of human chronic granulomatous disease (CGD) with a defect in the gene encoding interferon-gamma. This report describes the histopathological features and the culture characteristics of this actinomycosis. The murine periradicular lesions were evident macroscopically and microscopically. Macrophages positive for nitroblue tetrazolium (NBT) staining were found to be infiltrated throughout the granulation tissue. The surrounding tissue appeared to be intact with only mild neutrophil infiltration. The lesion culture of this murine actinomycosis was positive for Actinomyces urogenitalis. On polymerase chain reaction analysis, a DNA fragment of A. urogenitalis was detected in the dental pulp and lesion samples. This is the first report of an actinomycosis in a mouse model, although actinomycosis has been reported in humans and other species in the past. The usefulness of the interferon-gamma KO mouse for study of actinomycosis was further demonstrated.
