with a breast mass with spontaneous rupture at 14 weeks' gestation. Exploratory surgery showed breast tissue containing a live baby and a large necrotic tumor, which progressed to ectopic rupture and presented a major bleeding peroperatively, and she was referred for emergency cesarean section. The histopathological examination of the breast mass showed a live fetus at 14 weeks' gestation and the ectopic kidney with a necrotic core had secondary invasion by the fetus, while the normally located kidney was normal. This is a very unusual presentation with multiple complications in one case.And guess what? You need a new licence! (Image: Mark Squires) We have good news and bad news. The good news is that you only need one licence for every couple of guinea pigs. The bad news is you have to get a licence from the European Union to breed them. That sounds like it might be impractical, but you wouldn't say that if you wanted to get into breeding great-grandkids. The scheme Guinea pig farmers must get a licence from the EU. The rules came into effect in 2005 and it is technically possible to have over 100 guinea pigs in a cage. The EU says this is not what it wants, so in 2012 it set up a small experimental scheme to see how well the rules are working. The experiment, called "Large Scale Paternal Unknown Breeding", began in 2014. It is now coming to an end after 2.3 million litres of guinea pig urine were collected and processed. The results in total, the researchers found 12 illegal mating pairs - that is, parents paired with their offspring - and that the rules were
