Treatment of dry-eye disease with poly(vinyl alcohol)-based tear substitutes. Patients with dry-eye disease typically experience discomfort and discomfort from the sensation of a foreign body in their eyes. Treatment has traditionally involved the use of artificial tears. Recently, poly(vinyl alcohol)-based artificial tears have been developed. To determine the efficacy and safety of the use of poly(vinyl alcohol)-based artificial tears in patients with dry-eye disease. This randomized, double-blind, vehicle-controlled, parallel-group study compared the efficacy and safety of poly(vinyl alcohol)-based artificial tears with vehicle in 64 patients aged 18 to 65 years with moderate-to-severe dry-eye disease. The patients received 1 bottle per eye twice a day for 12 weeks. Outcome measures included change in ocular and subjective symptoms. The primary outcome measure was change in visual analogue scale (VAS) score at baseline and week 12. Secondary outcome measures included corneal and conjunctival staining, tear film breakup time, Schirmer tear test score, Short Form-36 version 2, and adverse events. A total of 64 patients were enrolled and randomized; 61 completed the study. Significant improvements in VAS score and tear film breakup time were found in the poly(vinyl alcohol)-based artificial tears group compared with the vehicle group at all time points (P Vitamin D supplementation in patients with suspected or known primary hyperparathyroidism. Four studies reported an improvement in calcium and phosphate values after vitamin D supplementation. No significant improvement in either calcium or phosphate levels was reported in 3 studies. The placebo controlled studies did not show a change in the prevalence or severity of hypercalcaemia.

What's New In?

Digital cameras have become ubiquitous for a wide array of consumers and businesses. Digital images are increasingly utilized for personal communication, photo sharing, and personal printing services via digital cameras or software applications for personal computers. Most individuals and businesses owning a personal computer have at least one or more cameras, such as digital still and video cameras. Photographs taken with digital cameras are increasingly being stored for use in "Web" applications in which images are uploaded to personal websites and within the "address book" of a smart phone application. Many consumers own printers for printing photographs taken with digital cameras. However, consumers may not have the equipment or the desired printing techniques to print high-quality photographs or slide-show presentations. Alternatively, a consumer may purchase high-quality printed photographs or slideshows from other consumers, but may wish to purchase the same photograph or slide show from another source. For example, a young couple may prefer to purchase wedding photographs from another couple who owns a professional-grade studio or dSLR digital still and video camera. In order to have such photographs reproduced on a high-quality printer, the photographer must have a multi-plate drum "tandem," that is, a separate camera and printer. Due to the expense of purchasing a dedicated camera and printer, most consumers must limit themselves to utilizing their "personal" "point and shoot" digital camera to take photographs of the wedding and subsequently have those photographs printed using a non-professional "photo booth" or with a consumer-grade printer at a photobooth. It is therefore desirable to provide a user with the ability to take photographs of a wedding using a digital camera and have those photographs printed at a high quality using a home or business printer. There was a problem with my flying machine, and I didn't see it until it was too late. If I had landed at first instead of peering through the front windscreen, I would have been riding away from my life, with no reprieve or second chance. I wasn't raised to be cowardly, and my first instinct wasn't to smash myself against a tree and keep going. It was to tell Tom what I had discovered: 'Something's wrong!' I couldn't see through the windscreen. There was no way I could tell whether we were stationary or whether we were gliding. It was a false calm; it was a lull before the storm. I shouted into the open cockpit and hoped that nobody would hear
